National American Indian and Alaska Native Heritage Month began with the efforts of Dr. Arthur C. Parker, a Seneca Indian -- considered the first Native American archaeologist -- who argued vigorously for recognition of Native Americans and persuaded the Boy Scouts in the early 1900s to recognize a "First Americans" day.

F. Red Fox James of the Blackfoot Nation was also instrumental through his campaign in 1914, traveling around the country on horseback to gain the support of state governors for the idea of a national observance. In 1915, the Congress of the American Indian Association put together a plan to establish American Indian Day on the second Saturday of May. The first official state observance was in New York in May of 1916.

Other states followed. However, it wasn't until 1990 that a national observance was formally recognized. President George H.W. Bush proclaimed November of 1990 "National American Indian Heritage Month."
